On July 9, Crippen was visited by detectives from Scotland Yard. He was calm and apparently frank. He admitted that he lied about the death of his wife, but gave as an excuse the rather plausible statement that after a quarret with him she had told him she was going to leave him for another man and return to America. He gave the name of a man, and said that he believed that his wife would be found living with him in Chicago.

Although the detectives were in a measure disarned by his story, they believed that his wife would be found living with him in Chicago.

Although the detectives were in a measure disarmed by his story, they decided to keep him under surveillance. Their activity, however, aroused the doctor's fears, and that same night in company with his stenographer, he fied the city. Scotland Yard men paid another visit to the doctor's home a few days later, but the bird had flown An alarm was immediately sent out, and developments followed thick and fast.

A neighbor suddenly recalled that on the night of February 2 she had heard a woman's cries of "Don't! Don't" issuing from the Crippen house. The cries had ceased; then came a heavy sound as though some one had fallen. She reported the story to the police. Scotland Yard made a thorough examination of the house the doctor had abandoned, and on July 13, nearly five months after the commission of the crine, found the mangled remains of the once beautiful Belle Elmore, burled in quicklime under the cellar floor.

Then began the search for the pair through Europe, through England and on the high seas.

On July 20 the Steamer Montrose puffed slowly out of Antwerp, changed her course and stood out for Quebec. Among the few passengers were the Rev. Mr Robinson and the cleic's son, a slight and rather effeminate looking youth, who occupied a stateroom with his father. The Rev. Mr Robinson was a very reticent cleric. He talked but little with his fellow passengers, preferring the society of his books and the company of his son. In fact, his extreme and unnatural reticence and nervousness drew the attention of the ship's commander to the pair. He had read in European papers of the disappearance of Crippen and the Leneve Woman and had seen their pictures in a weekly magazine. Their' actions aroused his suspicions observation changed there suspicions into certainty, and he communicated with the outside world by means of wireless telegraphy with which his pease was equipped.

changed these suspicions into certainty, and he communicated with the outside world by means of wireless telegraphy with which his vessel was equipped.

Inspector Dew, of Scotland Yard, received the message, and although the ship bearing the suspects was far out at sea, he made inquiry at the London steamship officers and shipped in the Laurentic also bound for Quebec, and due to arrive in that city before the Montrose.

On board the Montrose Dr. Crippen and his companion whiled away the hours as best they could. They were entirely ignorant of the captain's suspicions, and the fact that all his movements were being reported by wireless. For that matter, none of the passengers was aware of the identity of the pair, nor the efforts being made to apprehend them.

As the voyage neared its end their spirits arose, and they even went so far as to make friends with some of the passengers.

spirits arose, and they even went so far as to make friends with some of the passengers.

In the meantime the Laurentic had landed inspector Dew at Pather Point, where he was greeted by representatives of the press from all over the world, who had gathered to report the final chapter of the great chase.

Inspector Dew arranged to be taken out to the Montrose as soon as she was sighted, and disguised himself as a pilot, so that in the event of Crippen and Miss Leneve being on deck they would not recognize him. He feared that they might attempt suicide.

The two fugitives were on deck, but they were told that the me coming on board were pilots. As the Inspector stepped on board the Montrose, he beheld Crippen standing near him. He touched the fugitive on the arm. Crippen turned and recognized him. "I want to see you below, Crippen," said the inspector, "lead the way,"

The prisoners were taken back to England, where they were brought to trial in the Olg Balley Court, Crippen charged with the murder, and Ethel Clare Leneve as an accessory after the fact.

On October 17 the doctor was tried before Lord Chief Justice Alverstone.

Ladies and gentlemen in evening attire were coming and soins, sweet music came from an orchestra behind some palms, and in a restaurant across the hall were shaded lights, beautiful women, laughter, the clink of glasses and murmur of low conversation."

"Explain to the jury the phross evening clothes," suggested counsel. "Dress clothes, a dress suit," said the witness, turning to the row of shaggy faces, "is composed of black trousers, pants like any other pants, a cost and vest. The distinction is in the latter garment. The coat is cut so (showing with his hands), and the vest so."
